George Skelton Yuill, youngest son of an Aberdeenshire Free Church minister, was born at Peterhead on 29 February 1848. His mother was an Anderson and he began his career in shipping by working for his cousins in the London office of Anderson, Anderson & Co., later joint owners of the Orient Line. In 1872 he went out to Hong Kong to the shipping department of Butterfield & Swire, who the following year became agents for the new China Navigation Co. (CNC). He returned home in 1877 and married the sister of J.H. Scott of the family of Greenock shipbuilders and also Director of CNC. Then in 1880 he came out to Australia as General Manager of the Orient Line in Australia and from June 1881 took over from Gilchrist, Watt & Co. as Agent in Sydney, serving as such until March 1892. Around 1885, after an approach from John Turnbull of The Adelaide S.S. Co. Ltd, he was instrumental in achieving agreement between local and foreign lines to stabilise passenger fares between Adelaide and Melbourne. The agreement was shortlived, but Yuill gained the confidence of the Adelaide Company: in 1890 he was invited onto the board and in November 1892 he was appointed Agent in Sydney, initially as G.S. Yuill & Co. at 17 Bridge Street, then from April 1896 as G.S. Yuill & Co. Ltd of 6 Bridge Street. To maintain a reliable supply of ships' bunkers, in 1892 Yuill also took over management of the Corrimal Coal Co. Ltd and its mine on the South Coast of NSW – in January 1912 he took delivery in Sydney of the new 1,140-ton, Grangemouth-built, 3-masted collier Corrimal designed for direct ship-to-ship bunkering in Sydney Harbour and so used until sale in 1926.

In April 1900, flowing from his former employment with Butterfield & Swire and family ties with Scotts, Yuill became Australian agent in Sydney, Newcastle and Melbourne for CNC's four clipper-bowed sisterships of the China-Australia Line. Following the American seizure of the Spanish Philippines in 1898, there had emerged a good demand in Manila for frozen meat, which at first was met by U.S. Navy supply ships loading from Sydney and Brisbane. According to Marriner & Hyde, 'The Senior' (1967), in mid-1899 B&S had decided to upgrade their service by installing refrigerating machinery in Changsha and Taiyuan and in the following year formed a three-way venture with Yuill & Co. and local merchant house Smith, Wood & Co. to open cold stores in Manila and Iloilo. In 1907 Yuill gained control of Queensland Meat Export & Agency Co. Ltd and thereby also Singapore Cold Storage Co. Ltd, then proceeded to buy out the one-third holding of B&S in the Philippines venture. In mid-1908 the other two unrefrigerated sisters, Chingtu and Tsinan, were withdrawn and B&S seem to have considered disengaging completely from the trade, in which they were being worsted by stiff competition from E&A, NYK and NDL, to concentrate upon the China Coast.

Early in 1912 Yuill visited London, returning home via the United States, Japan and Hong Kong, and the future of the China-Australia service may well have come under discussion. In February Yuill & Co. acquired Guthrie (1884) from Burns, Philp & Co. and on 6 April despatched her to Manila and Hong Kong on their own account. In July it was announced that G.S. Yuill & Co. Ltd had formed the Australian-Oriental Line Ltd and had bought the two CNC ships to run under its managing agency. From 6 August all three ships were advertised under the Australian-Oriental Line. A three-ship service was not justified, however, and on her return to Australia in November Guthrie was chartered back to Burns, Philp & Co. for a roundtrip to Singapore. Returning to Sydney in January 1913 she seems to have been laid up, before sailing for the last time on 4 July for Hong Kong and delivery to new owners.

Despite having their engines tripled and being fitted with new refrigerating machinery, Changsha and Taiyuan were now rather out-classed on the route and it may well be that new building plans were overtaken by the First World War. In September 1921 the company was reported to have purchased the Russian-flag sisters Emperor Alexander III (5153/14) and Emperor Nicholas I (5642/13), 13-14-knot ships with accommodation for 80 first and 52 second-class passengers (compared with only 15, 12 and 28 on the two old ships). A few weeks later, however, the deal fell through because of a mortgage on the ships held by the builders and a lien by French interests. Changsha and Taiyuan, which in August 1920 had both been transferred to Hong Kong registry to avoid the manning requirements of the Navigation Act, therefore sailed on, but were both to suffer serious mishaps. In March 1923 Taiyuan was badly damaged after striking a rock near Bowen (Qld), then in August Changsha stranded en route to Hong Kong and was out of service for three months. To maintain the service the elderly Kut (3513/82), originally Lund's 'Blue Anchor Line' emigrant ship Warrnambool, was taken on 12-month charter from Kaye, Son & Co. of London.

After many conflicting rumours, in May 1924 it was confirmed that Yuills had contracted with the Hong Kong & Whampoa Dock for two 4,300-ton triple-expansion steamers. The builders specialised in the construction of China coasters and the new ships were in essence enlarged China coasters, with an extra deck and an extra hatch for a cargo deadweight of 4,000 tons, including 500 tons refrigerated. Comfortable accommodation was provided for 48 first, 50 second and 200 third-class passengers with some limited provision for deck passengers over short legs. Speed was cited as 15 knots, service speed more likely about 14 knots. With a slight rake to the masts, a white line around the hull, and a buff funnel instead of the former black, the new ships looked very smart indeed and in terms of comfort were a good match even for the NYK rivals. First to be delivered was Changte (彰德 = 'show virtue'), which sailed from Hong Kong on her maiden voyage on 30 September 1925, taking over from the old Taiyuan which had arrived northbound several days previously and, after discharging in Shanghai, proceeded to Japan for breaking up. Completion of Taiping (太平 = 'peace and security'), however, was delayed by the anti-British boycott and she did not begin her maiden voyage until January 1926. Although sold to breakers in August 1925, Changsha therefore had to make another roundtrip and was not delivered to breakers until the end of December.

A regular monthly service was maintained until the outbreak of World War II, and then disrupted for a decade. Changte was immediately requisitioned by the Royal Navy as a naval stores issuing ship, followed by Taiping in January 1942. Before they could resume normal postwar service, both required major refits, which included raising their passenger capacity to 91 first and 100 third-class (in dormitories). Changte returned from Colombo on 9 February 1946 and was placed in the hands of Poole & Steele of Balmain (Sydney) for work that should have been completed by the following September at a cost of £100,000; in the event she was not available until March 1948 at a cost three times greater. Taiping returned from Colombo on 6 July 1946 but was then used as a supply ship for Australian forces at Kure in Japan until early 1947. On release she made one commercial voyage to the Far East and was then entrusted to Mort's Dock for a refit which ultimately cost £0.5 million and was not completed until September 1949. Part of the reason for the prolonged refit was that the wooden deck cladding had rotted above the steel plate, but the slow working rate in Australia was also to blame. In the interim, as mentioned above, a monthly service was maintained by the motorships Yochow and Yunnan on charter from CNC, then from mid-1947 Yunnan and the new Shansi.

The high costs of new tonnage and the huge over-runs on the costs of refitting the two existing ships put paid to any ideas Yuills may have had to expand the service. An amicable agreement was therefore able to be reached with CNC, which was now looking to re-enter the Australian trade, and the latter ordered two new ships to run a joint service. Changsha and Taiyuan came into service during 1950, reviving the names of the two original A-O Line vessels, which had been built for CNC. The joint service was maintained until the delivery of Changte and Taiping to breakers in the second half of 1961, after which the A-O Line was disbanded and CNC took over the full service in its own right. Swire & Yuill (in March 1969 restyled Swire & Gilchrist Pty Ltd) continued, however, to serve as CNC agents in Sydney until placed in liquidation in December 1977, after which the business was taken over by Nedlloyd Swire Pty Ltd.

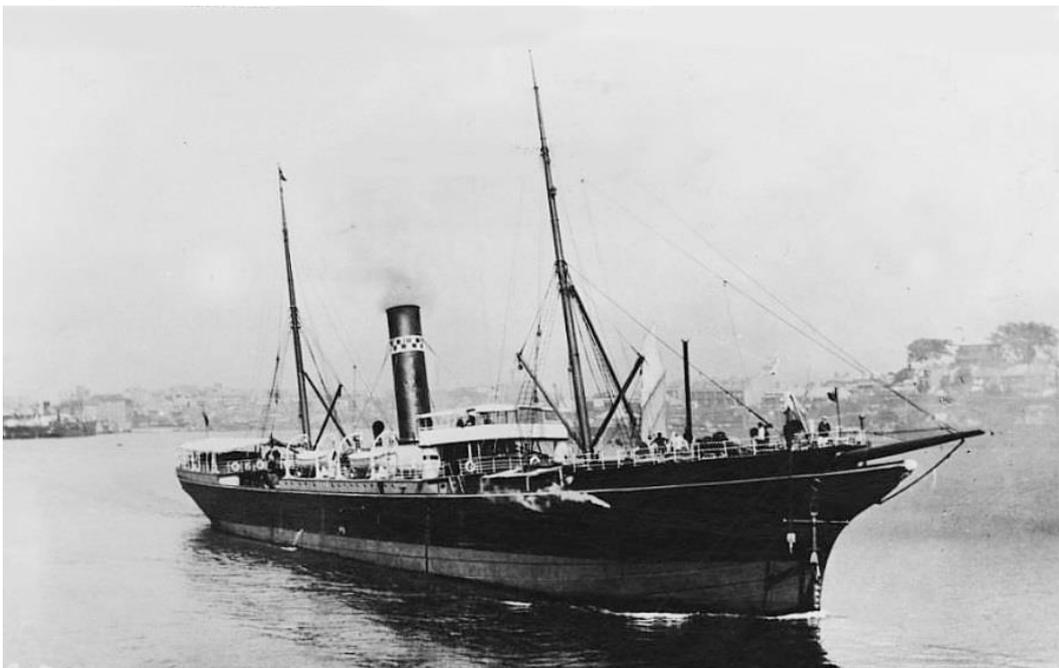

G.S. Yuill died in Sydney on 10 October 1917 in his 70th year and had remained active in his various businesses until suffering a stroke a few days earlier (SMH, 11/10/17). His wife having long predeceased him, he had maintained his quarters in the Union Club on Bligh Street, just around from the company's office. His daughter and only child, Winnifreda, had on 2 February 1907 in London married Lionel Arthur Henry Seymour Dawson-Damer, 6th Earl of Portarlington (1883-1959), who through his wife duly inherited the Yuill estate and its diversified interests, most notably in the meat and livestock trade. Before World War I, Yuills had already been involved in the Queensland Meat & Livestock Co. Ltd and Australian Stockbreeders Co. Ltd. Indeed, one of the objects in starting the Australian-Oriental Line had been to develop the market for frozen meat in Manila and Hong Kong. In 1965 Yuill Properties Ltd bought out the controlling interest in Australian Stockbreeders, which controlled six cattle stations - the deal was financed by the sale in February 1964 to BHP of the Corrimal Colliery. Mainly through the Australian & Oriental Trading Company Ltd, registered in Nassau, the group also held interests in export trading in Britain, cold stores and food processing in Singapore and Malaya, and trading and engineering activities in Australia. The 7th Earl, George Lionel Yuill Seymour Dawson-Damer (b. 1938), and also his heir, perpetuate the family name and business connection.
